History of The Bun Penny

The origins of the building date back to medieval times, when Manor Way was just a track joining the area's agricultural settlements with the villages of Titchfield and Stubbington. By the 17th century, it was a farmhouse and in the 19th century it was converted into the Victoria Hotel, as attempts were made to develop Lee on the Solent into a holiday resort with the arrival of the railway.

Later in the 20th century, the building was refurbished more or less to what we see today, and during these works, with the demolition of some outbuildings, quantities of Bun Pennies were discovered.

The Bun Penny, first minted in 1860, took its name from the depiction of the young Queen Victoria with her hair in a bun, and it was a milestone in British coinage. It replaced copper with bronze for lower denomination UK coins; it featured a seated Britannia facing right on the reverse and it set the dimensions of a penny - both of which remained in place until 1970. Bun Pennies were minted every year from 1860 until 1894, during which time Victoria's portrait was subtly changed as she aged. There are also changes to Britannia, her shield and the Light House, all of which makes these coins of interest to collectors. Whilst pennies were minted throughout the rest of Victoria's reign, in these, her portrait has lost the bun and she is shown wearing a veil.

It is rather fitting that our pub, with its long heritage, should be named after a coin of such historical importance. As far as we know, there are only a few pubs named The Bun Penny in the UK.
